Update of Lange Trust sculptures

Location moved of one of the sculptures by the Chesapeake Lofts after it blew over twice. It is now at the southeast corner of the building, rather than the northeast.

Marsha Carrington noted that the sculpture blends in with the building. She added that in regards to the program, the sculptures need to be expansive in public spaces. Some of the sculptures are so cool, but they get lost because of their size. The fish bones are great, but get lost in Huron Park. She loves the one at the Library and thinks it could be a good concept for Columbus Avenue.

Robin Lloyd asked for clarification on the suspension sculptures through Lange Trust.

Greg Voltz said they intend to move forward but it is in a standstill because of the COVID-19 pandemic. The artist lives out of the country and needs to see the environment before deciding where sculptures go. Everyone wants to move forward again when it is possible.

At 5:53 p.m., upon motion of Chris Parthemore and second of Robin Lloyd, the commission voted to adjourn. The Chairman declared the motion passed.
